Special Topics in Language, Literacy, and Culture:

LLC 750, Section 01 Social Movements, Cultural Change, and Publicly Engaged Scholarship

This seminar investigates various theoretical and methodological approaches drawn from disciplines involved with LLC to understand the connections between social movements as expressions of time and place, cultural change and identity, and public scholarship as engaged, participatory action. We investigate various movements in their historical and place-based contexts as we learn about epistemologies and theories of change; the production and reproduction of discourse and narratives; knowledge dissemination strategies, mechanisms and media; struggles for cultural transformation and hegemony; concepts and practices of publics and politics enacted through public scholarship; and traditional and participatory action research methodologies used to study, document or advance social movements. We read about particular local, national and global social movements; hear from people who have participated in and studied social movements; and critically assess convergences, divergences, underlying principles, and connections between movements. Each seminar participant contributes to leading discussions and studies a social movement or movements of particular interest.

LLC 750, Section 03 Digital Rhetorics

This course provides a graduate-level study of methods in digital rhetoric and humanities. Our major objectives include: understanding the components of digital rhetoric; learning how new types of analysis and modes of rhetoric appear in relation to the electronic ecology of contemporary culture; appreciate the values, politics, and ethics in digital “rhetorical appeals” and composition; and, learn how to write and design your own digital rhetoric projects including publishable reviews of scholarship in that area.
