Special Topics in Language, Literacy, and Culture:

LLC 750, Section 01  Fake News, Typos & Redactions  Professor Saper

The zeitgeist of contemporary American culture appears in accusations of fake news, mockery of typos in Tweets and newspapers, and the FoIA (Freedom of Information Act) release of heavily redacted documents. On the face of the page, these texts have a literalness: they appear as literal fact without knowing the literal meaning. Instead these systems of communication signal connotations rather than signify denotative meanings. Their significance is not immediately obvious, and suggest that readers ask about the intention of an action, an imagined scene of writing or redaction, and the (perhaps unwitting) choices of the source of the text.

Those who study language use and literacy need to focus on these new forms of communication that signal more than they signify. Without those literacy skills, students are at a distinct disadvantage in navigating and interpreting three major forms of communication in contemporary culture. Students will develop a specific list of sociolinguistic and sociopoetic strategies, will develop reading practices suited to these contemporary forms and learn to perform readings.
